Balancing Remote Work with

Remote work and study can offer flexibility, but in the process, it can also lead to burnout. Whether you're working from home or simply trying to balance work and school, here are some tips < <https://zight.com/blog/balancing-work-and-school>

1. Use Technology Intentionally Lean on productivity tools, but don't let them control you.
2. Take Regular Breaks Step away from your screen every hour. Take a walk, get some fresh air, or just stretch.
3. Define Your Work-Life Boundaries Create distinct work and personal spaces. Use different devices or apps for work and personal time.
4. Practice Self-Care Make time for daily self-care that recharge you.
5. Create a morning and end-of-day routine Morning routine: Start your day with a consistent routine. Evening routine: End your day with a consistent routine. Engage in activities that bring you joy.

This summer, embrace the opportunity to be intentional about cutting technology completely but instead utilizing it wisely. By making small shifts in our tech habits, you can stay grounded, connected, and productive.

While it's always tempting to lean into more screen time, taking a step back from digital habits and investing in our well-being is the key to staying balanced and productive.

In May, our ITS team highlighted Mental Health Awareness Month at George Mason's Center for the Advancement of Well-Being (CAWB). It's a month—it's something we can prioritize all year long, so let's make the most of it.
